

Safety First

Stop To Talk, Stop To Text

Today, over 203 million adults in the United States own a cellular phone, and smartphones make up nearly 70% of those phones. Mobile technology has been and continues to be adopted faster than any other technology in history. These are interesting facts, but here are two important questions for us:

- 1) How do mobile devices change behavior?
- 2) How do these changes in behavior impact our ability to work safely?

Various studies indicate that people spend as much as 12 hours per day looking at screens. There are screens at work, at home, in our cars, in waiting rooms, in elevators, in lobbies, and in our hands. If you are thinking what we thought, there is no way that we spend 12 hours every day looking at screens, keep in mind that it may very well be true for other people: contractors at our job sites, truck drivers in our quarries and at our plants, and many drivers passing through our work zones.

Instead of becoming complacent or skeptical about technology in our lives, remember there is always one thing that you can control and that is your own behavior. Set the example with your family, with your friends, and your coworkers. Never pick up your phone while driving through a work zone, never text while driving, don't walk while talking or typing on your phone, and never use it while operating equipment or performing a safety sensitive task. Show everyone around you how to use mobile devices safely because what you do makes a difference.
